ADIRONDACK MEMORIES.

Lake Placid.

The crested peak of Whiteface towers high.

Across its sides the fleeting shadows fall.

Below, the rippling waves of Placid lie.

While from the woods ring forth the wild-bird's call.

Around the shore in many a shady nook.

Gleam out the tents of some secluded camp.

Where time is whittled away with gun and bow.

From morn, till evening lights each glowing lamp.

How swiftly dart the light glimmers from the shore.

Out on the shimmering waves gay boaters fly.

The sparkling waters glint on every oar.

While from the lake smiles back the azure call.

Upon the green-clad brow of yonder hill.

An artist's masterpiece, 'a villa stands there.

Owned by some lord of men or crowned mill.

Reared by the wondrous work of human hands.

The peak—the lake—the camp in stately nook.

The wood—from whence peals out the wild-bird's song.

All this, is but a page from memory's book.

A scene, that in the nature lingers long.

The glare of noon now fades to evening's glow.

The crimson-gold of sunset tints the west.

The glorious glow of day has fallen low.

Behind the distant hills he sinks to rest.

The glowing fair, gives way to dusky night.

The stars above have lit each twinkling lamp.

The crescent moon sheds far its silvery light.

O'er hill and dale, o'er lake and peaceful camp.

Thus Nature's calm our troubled thoughts doth quell.

To restless hearts their burdens lighter seem.

'Mid scenes like this we fain would ever dwell.

Eye live—in one, unending, summer's dream!

"EIGHTY SEVEN."
