The All-Time Team ■ Compiled by Ted Gangi

Grantland Rice chats with Army's rugged Joe Henry. Rice picked Henry, from Clearfield, Pa., as one of the first team guards on his 1948 Look All-America.

GRANTLAND RICE picks the Look ALL-AMERICA

with the assistance of 440 members of the Football Writers Association of America

By GRANTLAND RICE

Grantland Rice, dean of American sportswriters, has been the acknowledged official selector of All-America teams since the death in 1925 of Walter Camp, the originator of the All-America idea.

SELECTING the 1948 Look All-America football team involved consideration of the controversial two-platoon system. This system employs separate teams on offense and defense.

The powerful 1947 Michigan team, Western Conference and Rose Bowl champion, popularized it. The Wolverines retained it, again to excellent effect. In 1948, and West Point used it brilliantly. Cornell, Harvard and a few others substituted liberally, if not completely, whenever the ball changed hands.

The two-platoon system receives criticism. Coaches with limited material knew it is not for them. Swinging-door substitutions confuse fans and irritate writers and announcers. Most defensive players on two-platoon squads yearn for the old days when they could throw a block or even run the ball.

On the other hand, the rules permitting unlimited substitutions make the two-platoon game practical for coaches with abundant material. They can give each player twice as much coaching as before, because the offensive and defensive player now spends the full practice instead of half the practice on his specialization.

In the game itself, the two platoons make for more expert performance and sustained tempo. Even the player who bemoans his lack
