Foreword

by Hal Nelson, Brigadier General, USA (Ret)

In the 1870s, as part of the observation of our nation's centennial, Benjamin Poore published a register and congressional directory—a comprehensive volume encompassing the officials of all branches of national government since the Continental Congress. He included a useful observation in his introductory essay:

While the Republic has preserved with commendable pride the histories of her martial defenders, it is well that the memories and services of her legislators should also be honored and cherished. Posterity should have accurate information concerning those who “in congress assembled” have enacted the laws under which the United States have advanced from feeble infancy into the vigors of maturity and have successfully combated attacks from foreign and domestic foes.

This book focuses that sentiment on a particular set of legislators and serves as a testament to selfless service to our nation. While it is limited to telling the story of those currently serving in Congress who have roots in the United States Army, it can be seen as one chapter in our nation's history stretching back to the days of the Continental Congress. The leaders who forge our laws have always been among those who have put their lives on the line in military service. Some observers of today's political scene are unaware of that tradition. Others are unaware of the Army backgrounds of today's members of Congress. This book fills those gaps in public awareness.

We often forget that George Washington was serving with the Virginia delegation to the Continental Congress when he accepted the call to command the new Continental Army in the siege of Boston. While Washington's militia experience was more extensive than that of any other delegate, the Father of our Country was one among many of the Founding Fathers who combined military and political service in a lifetime of dedication to filling the nation's needs. Today's Congress carries on traditions as old as our nation when it welcomes new members who began their service in the Army, and it holds the potential to return leaders to the Army during times of military crisis just as it has done in the past.

Today's Army is made up of components: the active Army, the Army National Guard, and the Army Reserve. Throughout much of our history, the small Regular Army was augmented with state militias and volunteers during emergencies. Members of Congress always played a key role in those augmentations, whether we look back to the war with Britain (1812–15), the war with Mexico (1846–48), the War of the Rebellion (1861–65), or the war with Spain (1898). As the twentieth century began, legislators who were veterans were among those who laid the groundwork for our current system, and since that time our Congress has included leaders whose military roots are in all three components. This book provides insights into the ways the three components have allowed these successful leaders to “be all they can be.” As we reflect on their success from this perspective, we are reminded that Army service opens many doors for young men and women in our society. This has been true since the earliest days of the Republic. We see it in every walk of life, and it is reassuring to see it in our Congress.

Throughout our history we have been an egalitarian society with a hierarchical military structure. Revolutionary leaders adopted European models to increase the odds for success against a European foe, and the system of commissioned and noncommissioned officers with distinctive ranks and well-defined responsibilities continues to be the framework for our military organizations. Our egalitarian society provides capable young men and women who rise in rank with extended service. Many leave the Army after only a few years, having served honorably and learned much, achieving few promotions but transforming the discipline and maturation gained in the Army into the foundation for a civilian career. Those patterns are evident in this book. A few members of Congress have had extensive military experience and have risen to high military rank. Far more have built on their Army experience in business and in politics.

In recent years many observers of the Congress have commented on the declining percentage of members who have served in our armed forces. When the 103rd Congress seemed to usher in an era of change with a large class of freshmen and a shift in the majority party, one analyst noted, “Only 18.2 percent of the House freshmen and 3 of the 14 freshmen senators had prior military experience....This is in contrast to the 47.7 percent of the current House incumbents and 60 percent of the 1974 House freshmen class who have had military experience.” This book takes that statement beyond statistics and gives it a human face. Many of the members profiled here are among the more senior in both the Senate and the House. There are junior members, but they are not so numerous. Many factors may help to explain the change. The younger people who win elections today are products of the post-draft era. There were few attractions to military service when they began their adult lives, and many established their leadership credentials in their communities without a military “hitch.” While the resulting percentage of veterans in Congress shows a downward trend in the years since World War II, we should note that the percentage of veterans in the U.S. population is estimated at about 11 percent. When viewed from that perspective, veterans are still well represented in Congress.

Any reader who spends time with this book will come away with a sense of the commitment to national service shared by all of the leaders profiled here. They come from every walk of life and have had a broad range of military, educational, business, and legislative experience. But they share a willingness to serve our nation—the fundamental motivator among our fine soldiers still serving today. We can all be proud that they “soldier on.”

Preface

We have great admiration and respect for those who represent us through their service in the United States Senate or House of Representatives. Many have twice earned our gratitude by serving also in a component of the United States Army, some risking their lives in combat and shedding their blood in defense of our nation.

AUSA presents this book to honor those in the 112th Congress who have served the United States as Soldiers and continue to serve as Legislators. We salute you and are proud to be your comrades.

Once a Soldier...Always a Soldier.

Introduction

This book presents Soldiers serving in the 112th Congress in alphabetical order—senators followed by representatives. The book also contains listings of the oversight committees as well as the members of the House Army Caucus and the Reserve Components Caucus, Senate National Guard Caucus, Senate Reserve Caucus and Senate Army Caucus. There is information about how to communicate with Congress including addresses, telephone numbers, and Web addresses. Information about the location of additional resource material about Congress, the Army, and national security is also provided.

A special section is devoted to information about the Association of the United States Army—its mission and objectives.

“As a high school student, I witnessed the attack on Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941. In 1945, on duty in the Marianas, I saw the departure of the Enola Gay on its fateful mission. These two historic events are bookends to the most crucial milestone in the history of this century: the Second World War and the struggle between democracy and tyranny.”

For me, the sacrifices made by ordinary men and women who rallied in defense of liberty, democracy and the great promise of America represent the greatest heroism and patriotism in service of our country.

Army training and service ingrained in me the importance of discipline and shared responsibility to success. Working side by side with young men from different states, cities and towns, I discovered that their dreams and hopes for the future were not unlike my own. The lessons and values important to me were tested and tempered during wartime.

The peace, liberty and prosperity we cherish carries a dear price. Our sacred obligation is to ensure its preservation for future generations.”

“When the Japanese bombed Pearl Harbor, all the Japanese citizens and non-citizens were designated by the Selective Service System as ‘4-C’ which meant that I was an ‘enemy alien.’ I wanted very much to demonstrate that we were just as good as anyone else, and prepared to defend America’s democratic ideals. In January of 1943, President Roosevelt announced, ‘no loyal citizen of the U.S. should be denied the democratic right to exercise the responsibilities of his citizenship, regardless of his ancestry.’ I, along with other young Americans of Japanese ancestry, volunteered for the Army and served as members of the 442nd Regimental Combat Team. We proudly served our nation in combat in the European Theater of Operations and our war time actions helped to dispel in a most dramatic and bloody manner any doubts relating to the patriotism of Japanese Americans.”

“When I enlisted in the U.S. Army in 1942, I had no idea of the magnitude that it would have on my life. My father was on his deathbed, but I wanted to volunteer to serve my country. After basic and specialist training, I was assigned to the 3185th Signal Service Battalion and served 1944 and 1945 in England, France, and Belgium.

But it wasn't until I arrived back home that I knew how very much the Army had helped me. My mother was a young widow and I had family responsibilities, but I knew that getting a college education was vitally important. I was introduced to the G.I. Bill and utilized this opportunity to attend and graduate from Columbia University. Without my service in the Army, such an outstanding educational opportunity would never have been available to me. With my education now secured, I became one of the founders of Automatic Data Processing (ADP), a company employing over 30,000 people today.

Success for that generation was uniquely an American story. We were willing to work hard, and with the myriad opportunities offered as a result of Army service, many of us began careers we never anticipated. But with success came an understanding that giving something back to our country was a primary requisite. So after 30 years of building a company, I launched a new career in public service and was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1982.

I serve today, as proudly in the U.S. Senate, as I did in 1942, when I stood in the Enlistment office to sign up for the Army. I believe it was appropriate for my family, my country and myself to do that and I look back with pride and gratitude that I live in this country.”

"I am proud of my association with the Army. My military service ended sooner than the Army and I had planned when the discovery of a health condition led to an early Honorable Discharge. Nevertheless, I continue to be guided by the lessons that I learned as an Army ROTC Cadet in the classroom and on the drill field, in boot camp at Fort Benning, and while attending advance officers' training. These experiences helped teach me that qualities like patriotism, duty, discipline, loyalty and dependability are not just noble-sounding words, but are character traits that make it possible to accomplish difficult and dangerous missions. I learned that these qualities make good soldiers in the military and good citizens in civilian life. Based on my own experience, I say Congress can use as many Army alumni as it can get!"

“My experience in the Army had a strong influence on me and added to many positives in the rest of my life. However, when I look back at that time I remember those who gave the ultimate sacrifice to our country—those who served and gave their lives for our freedom. I feel honored I had the opportunity to serve—just as I feel honored now to serve in my current capacity. Because of my military experience, I was exposed to many other cultures. That exposure made me realize as never before what a tremendous gift and privilege it is to be an American.”

“I believe one of the most important things I learned while serving in the U.S. Army was discipline. I, like many young people going into the military, was not eager to follow instructions given to me by authority figures. However, I learned during basic training—and later in radio school—how important it is to obey orders and to follow and adhere to responsible leadership decisions.

One of the things I feel has led to a deterioration of our society has been a lack of discipline. For that reason, I believe young people should be taught the rule of law and respect for others during their formative years, and I can think of no better way for that to be accomplished than in the United States Army.

I am proud to have served in the U.S. Army.”

U.S. Army

“When asked to reflect on the value of Army service to the nation and the individual, I think of the life of service of the late Coleman Young, the first African-American mayor of Detroit. Born in the segregated South in 1918, his family moved to Detroit in 1923.

During World War II, he joined the Army. He was commissioned a lieutenant and became the first black bombardier in the Army Air Corps, as part of the famous Tuskegee Airmen. He fought the prejudice that existed in the Army. He stood up to unfair policies and practices, often at great personal risk. Despite arrest and the threat of court-martial, he and his brave colleagues stood up for what was right and laid the foundation for the progress that has been seen since.

The opportunities presented by the Army in today’s society are due in no small part to the courage and principle-based actions of African-American soldiers like Coleman Young.”

“I joined the Army because I wanted to be part of something bigger than myself. Through hard work, commitment and dedication, I earned the right to share in the heritage of those who served before me in the defense of our nation.”

The Army was a level playing field that allowed a 17-year-old kid from humble beginnings and an unimpressive past to radically change the direction of his life. I earned an appointment to West Point a year after enlisting, and the code of honor instilled in me has stayed with me and helped me succeed.

I am deeply grateful for the lessons taught to me by the non-commissioned officers and officers who were my role models, mentors and leaders. I carry those lessons forward, never letting a day pass without reflecting on the blessings of my life and the opportunity I have been given to guide and help others.”

“Army experience and service has done more to shape my life and give me the drive and ambition to continue to serve my country as a public servant than any other single event in my life. During my two years in the service, I gained invaluable experience. It taught me the meaning of discipline and respect—two qualities which I believe are the keys to success in the United States.”

I still keep in touch with many friends whom I met during my service. Friends made in the military are friends for life. But, overall, it taught me the meaning of loyalty and how important it is to our country and to the people who come into our lives. Now, when I am in the District, I still visit many of the men with whom I served at the Romanowski VFW Post 6896.”

“Growing up in Eastern North Carolina with such a heavy military presence, and having an opportunity to briefly serve, I have learned to appreciate and value our men and women in uniform. Since coming to Congress, I have developed an even greater respect for the dedication and sacrifice of our nation’s brave military. In the wars and conflicts of the past, over one million American soldiers have lost their lives fighting to provide for the peace that we continue to enjoy today. No other nation has sacrificed so much to promote peace here in America and throughout the world. The unmistakable courage and sacrifice of our men and women in uniform represent the very strength of this nation.”

"It has been a tremendous honor to have served in the U.S. Army. The American people owe their freedom and liberties to those who serve in the armed forces. They are indebted to those who have made the ultimate sacrifices for their country in previous world conflicts. America's strength and position as the sole superpower on earth is a result of this dedication to our country's defense. Without the armed forces, America would not have become the beacon of democracy for the world. As a current member of Congress, I look forward to working on issues which affect the men and women in today's military. The leadership skills which I experienced in the U.S. Army allow me to take the lead on issues which promote a stronger defense, provide for better pay and quality of life care for the uniformed services and their dependents, and full benefits for our nation's veterans."

“Over fifty years ago, President Truman signed Executive Order 9981, officially desegregating the U.S. military. The military institution that grew out of that executive order became the model for the society as a whole. The U.S. military is our finest example of equality, opportunity, upward mobility, and full inclusion in our social institutions. During World War II, a million African-American men and women served in uniform, including nearly 750,000 who served overseas in Europe and the Pacific. While they fought and died under the stigma of segregation, their heroic contributions marked the beginning of the end of segregated America. The brilliance of their performance in the war forced President Truman to sign Executive Order 9981 on July 26, 1948, ending the practice of segregation in the military. Their job was done well and will forever be remembered.”

“I have often wondered how different my life would have been if in 1966, I had not been drafted into the U.S. Army. I was born and raised on a farm near El Paso, Texas. I believe that had I not served in the U.S. Army, I might still be on that farm today instead of serving in the United States Congress.”

Today when I speak to students about decisions they will make that can dramatically change their lives, I stress to them what I learned long ago as a young soldier: ‘Freedom is not free.’

We live in the greatest democracy in the world and in a country that gives every one of us the opportunity to work hard and succeed. This democracy and opportunity is possible because of the dedication and commitment of our men and women in uniform. These men and women stand ready today, as they did in the past, to sacrifice their lives for their country. But as a soldier, you also learn that no one will be left behind, even at times risking all for the sake of saving one.

There are those who wonder what motivates the vigil to account for our MIA/POW comrades. Understanding may be answered by simply saying, ‘You had to be there to understand.’”

“Thousands of young men and women have served our nation in the armed services. I consider my own service in the Kentucky and North Carolina National Guard a life-building experience which has given me an important perspective when considering issues important to those who have and continue to serve our nation.

Those who have served America have traveled the globe carrying our banner of Liberty. For this service, we owe them greatly. They rightly deserve proper medical care and retirement benefits. The brave men who fought for our freedom are worthy of the best that we can provide.

As a U.S. Representative, I have worked hard to see that veterans are given the care and benefits they deserve. My door is always open to lend a helping hand to our veterans and also to assist the men and women who serve our nation here at home or around the world.

The brave men and women who serve America deserve our thanks, our support, and our enduring admiration.”

“I served as a soldier in the United States Army in 1963, during the height of the Civil Rights Movement. While enlisted, I encountered some elements of racism but overall, I look back on my military experience with fond memories and gratitude for the opportunity.”

As a young man, 17 years old, I can remember entering the Army uncertain of what to expect. It wasn't long however, that I received my assignments and got to work. I enjoyed my work as a battery clerk most of all. Five years later, I received an honorable discharge.

Unbeknownst to me, my years of service left me with a greater appreciation of teamwork, organization and mission focus. Today, I know that my military service played a vital part in my development as a well-rounded individual.”

Obtaining my education at West Point, serving in the regular Army, and continuing my service as a member of the Army Reserves has been crucial to my development as a citizen as well as a father and husband. Through the Army, I enhanced my appreciation for discipline, commitment, devotion, and selfless service to a higher cause. “There is no greater honor than serving my nation in uniform. Throughout my professional life, no experience had meant more to my success than that of serving as an officer in the U.S. Military. The leadership, management, and decision – making skills acquired as a result of my service to country have played an invaluable role in preparing me for the greater challenges I’ve faced in business and public service. The friendships – personal and professional – I have enjoyed as a result of my military service have been both life-long and life changing.”

Information about the Congress

The Committees charged with primary responsibilities for oversight of the Army are the Armed Services Committees of the House and Senate, and the Defense Subcommittees of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees. Their members are listed on the succeeding pages.

In addition to the formally constituted committees, several caucuses in the House and Senate pay attention to Army matters. Caucuses are informal groupings of members who share interests in a common topic. Despite being outside of the formal political structure, such groups seek to influence the policy process on a wide range of issues, often with some success. Two House caucuses are included: the Army Caucus and the Reserve Components Caucus. In the Senate, the Senate National Guard Caucus is included.

A section on communicating with Congress follows the committee listings. Readers may use the information in that section to express their views to their Representatives and Senators.

Association of the United States Army

The Association of the United States Army (AUSA) came into being on July 5, 1950 when the Army's senior leadership identified a need for the Army to put aside internal parochialism and speak with one voice in the best interest of the Army and the nation.

Two organizations—the Infantry Association and the Field Artillery Association—came together under the AUSA banner. On January 1, 1955, the Antiaircraft Association became a part of AUSA, extending the initial steps taken toward a single voice for the Army.

For more than 60 years, the Association of the U. S. Army has stood as the nation's voice for the United States Army. Its members are men and women; active, guard, and reserve; civilian employees; retirees; Family members; and friends of the Army. More than 120 chapters across America (and literally around the world) bring America's Army to the American people and, at the same time, serve as a voice for America's Army in the Halls of Congress.

Today, AUSA remains involved in many issues important to the men and women who serve this nation at home and abroad and the families they must so often leave behind. Additionally, AUSA serves as a conduit for communication between industry and the Army. AUSA's primary role, however, is that of educator. Professional meetings, symposia and a library of written, visual, and on-line information are available to the Army professional and the general public. Testimony, information papers, and other publications are frequently provided to Congress. Among other issues, AUSA works to highlight the need for adequate defense funding, equitable pay, access to quality health care, and a fair retirement system. AUSA continues to promote the interests of the United States Army and, in the final analysis, the United States.

AUSA Activities

(For more information, please visit the AUSA web site at www.ausa.org)

Membership

The Association of the United States Army offers a choice of three major membership categories. They are Individual Memberships, Corporate Memberships, and Sustaining Memberships.

Individual Memberships

AUSA individual memberships are available to the Active Army, Army National Guard, Army Reserve, Government Civilians, Retirees, Veterans, Wounded Warriors, family members and civilians. Life memberships are also available.

Corporate Membership

Corporate members are local businesses, corporations, professional and technical firms, societies and community groups that ally with one of AUSA's chapters. They are interested in supporting AUSA's goals locally and nationally. Corporate members may designate two, five or ten people to receive the privileges of individual membership.

Sustaining Membership

Sustaining Members are major industry leaders, businesses, and professional organizations. Approximately 20 percent of Sustaining Members are international companies. Sustaining Members may attend and exhibit at designated symposia, receive special publications, participate in breakfast presentations, and have priority at Annual Meeting activities. Sustaining Members may name 50 employees to receive full cardholder privileges.

Chapters

The AUSA Chapters worldwide develop programs and activities that provide community support for the Army through individual and corporate members. Chapters serve as the liaison between the Army and local civilian communities. They help educate the public about the needs for a strong national defense and the Army.

Typical chapter activities include general membership meetings with high profile guest speakers, community involvement events, support for Soldiers and Families, and special events honoring the Army and outstanding Soldiers.

Industry Affairs Directorate

AUSA's Industry Affairs Directorate is committed to supporting the Army-Industry partnership by providing a platform from which the Army can speak to industry and industry can speak with Army for the betterment of our national defense. We provide this platform through a wide variety of events including our symposia, our ILW Breakfast Series, the AUSA Annual Meeting and participation in international tradeshow. Through our signature leadership, award-winning publications, membership development, dynamic meetings and outstanding educational outreach, the Industry Affairs Directorate provides our members with unique opportunities to hear what our Army has say about its future, and to contribute. For more information on our events, please visit the AUSA website and click on the Meetings and Events page.

Legislative Affairs

The following represent key AUSA legislative objectives for 2011. The objectives are not necessarily stated in order of priority:

- ◆ Initiate and support efforts at the local and national level to increase the Defense Department budget as a share of the nation's gross domestic product.
- ◆ Work for healthcare programs that will guarantee access to quality healthcare for all military beneficiaries and promote adequate funding of the Defense Health Budget.
- ◆ Work to close the pay comparability gap between military pay, Department of the Army civilian pay, and that of the civilian sector. Fund and support the transformation and modernization of the Force. Work for recognition (within the Pentagon and on Capitol Hill) that the Army's end strength should be at least 1.3 million Soldiers (Active, Guard, and Reserve).
- ◆ Keep the focus on quality of life programs.
- ◆ Support funding to modernize and upgrade barracks and Family housing.
- ◆ Oppose initiatives to change the current retirement age, annuity formula provisions or retiree COLA allocations as they relate to Army civilians.
- ◆ Support legislation that would provide deployed civilian employees equivalent benefits afforded their active duty counterparts.
- ◆ Fund the Federal Impact Aid Program in the U.S. Department of Education budget to preclude the children of military families from being disadvantaged in public schooling.
- ◆ Support reconstituting and resetting the Current Force; rebalancing Army capabilities to strengthen readiness; creating modular forces with increased capabilities.
- ◆ Authorize and fund Reserve Component Full Time Support manpower requirements for the RC at 100 percent.

- ◆ Work to provide incentives and eliminate disincentives to service in the Reserve Components; to provide adequate health care protection and medical disability coverage for reservists; to provide educational benefits and academic protections for activated reservists; to lower the age for receipt of retirement pay from 60 to 55.
- ◆ Enact legislation to repeal in its entirety the Department of Veterans Affairs offset on retired military entitlement (concurrent receipt).

For all AUSA legislative resolutions in booklet form, write to AUSA's Government Affairs office or call 1-800-336-4570, ext. 637. An electronic version of the resolutions is available on the AUSA website at www.ansa.org/legislation.

Institute of Land Warfare

AUSA's Institute of Land Warfare (ILW) is charged with extending the reach and increasing the influence of AUSA by informing and educating our membership; local, regional and national leaders; and the American public on the critical nature of land warfare and the importance of the United States Army to the nation. In carrying out its mission, ILW manages an educational program of professional publications and forums designed to focus the defense on issues of importance to the nation's security and the critical role of the Army.

AUSA Family Programs

AUSA addresses Army Family needs through its Family Programs Directorate. Family Programs activities include:

- ◆ Presentations and briefings on military installations, to Family Readiness Groups (FRG), and at Family training events and conferences.
- ◆ Conducting focus groups to determine Family concerns.
- ◆ Representing AUSA and Army Families on various DoD and Department of the Army councils and advisory groups on topics such as health care, education, spouse employment, deployment and Family Readiness.

- ◆ Conducting Annual Meeting Military Family Forums and other activities to provide information on topics important to Army Families.
- ◆ Providing Family Readiness packets: Active-Duty, National Guard & Reserve, Wounded Warrior and Survivor, with benefits and Family Programs information upon request.
- ◆ Maintaining Family Program web page at www.ansa.org/family, which contains information such as family legislative issues, current and latest news, a reading list, consumer information and resources organized by topic.
- ◆ Providing weekly e-mail up-date to subscribers containing current information and policy changes affecting Families.

AUSA Products that inform members and the public

ARMY Magazine

A monthly four-color magazine focusing on the activities and interests of the U.S. Army worldwide. ARMY serves a readership interested in issues of national security; past and present issues involving landpower; and future trends in the military arts and sciences. The magazine focuses on developing and presenting thought-provoking articles and analysis for a professionally oriented audience.

AUSA News

This is a monthly newspaper for AUSA members. Reaching key people in uniform, industry, Congress, the Pentagon and the White House, AUSA NEWS offers a unique insight into what service leaders are thinking, what Congress is changing and what Soldiers, their Families, veterans, businessmen and businesswomen are saying and doing in the world's premier landpower force. Its timely reporting on subjects of direct importance to America's Army makes AUSA NEWS must reading for all ranks in the active force, Army National Guard, United States Army Reserve and all doing business with the Army.

In The News

Current information for and about the Army and national defense.

Institute of Land Warfare Publications and Seminars

ILW publishes a wide range of professional papers, including not only monographs, essays, newsletters and special reports, but also the Torchbearer Campaign family of national security reports, issue papers and alerts. All ILW products are available at no charge. Ordering information, a complete of list of available publications and the publications themselves (in .pdf format for easy downloading) can be found at www.ausa.org/ilw.

Benefits of Membership in the Association of the United States Army

For more than 61 years, the Association of the United States Army has been telling the Soldier's story on Capitol Hill. As a private, nonprofit, professional, educational association, AUSA has been a powerful influence on legislation that affects the Soldier. AUSA represents—Active, National Guard, Army Reserve, Retirees, Civilians, Veterans, Wounded Warriors and Family members.

Members of AUSA have access to special rates on term life, health care, and auto insurance. They also receive discounts on hotels, books, car rentals, a bank card, travel, college tuition and much more.

Members also receive professional publications and current information through AUSA's web site and its Institute of Land Warfare as well as monthly issues of ARMY Magazine and AUSA News.

The most important benefit of membership, however, is conveying AUSA member concerns to Congress.

Come join us!

For more information about how you can join the only association that speaks for the Army, please call us at 800-336-4570, ext. 664 or visit our web site at www.ausa.org.
