

African-American Civilians Interred in Section 27 of Arlington National Cemetery, 1864-1867

“An old section of Arlington national cemetery, dedicated to the burial of colored soldiers of the Union before the opening of the new addition to Arlington, is seldom entered by tourists. Though it is a place of great beauty and reverent quiet, it lies off the main track of travel. It may be reached in two ways: these are by the northeast gate or by following the steep gravel road that leads down from the rear of the mansion into the deep woods and ravines to the north. The east entrance leads between two tall, urn-capped, white columns inscribed with the names of two Federal generals, Ord and Weitzel. A watchman’s cottage surrounded by shrubbery and flowers is on the left. The road passes around a brilliant flower circle gorgeously illuminated this season with geraniums, verbenas, roses and petunias. To the westward stretch the ranks of marble headstones, some dark-stained by rains and frosts and some gloomy under a coat of moss. Over all spread somber spruce and sad pine trees. About twenty-five hundred graves are here. One large plot is given over to the graves of ‘contrabands,’ runaway slaves who died under the protection of the Union forces around Washington. There has long been an agitation among the colored posts of the Grand Army of the Republic for the erection of a monument to the negro dead in this part of the great burial ground, but the shaft has not been reared.

The field of graves lies between the Seneca sandstone north wall and a little stream on the south side that trickles down through the impressive wood—woodland yet untouched by the grave digger’s spade, and which covers the rough terrain north of the mansion. The timber there is white oak, and the trees, though tall, are not old. Their age is probably forty or fifty years, but the depth of the humous or forest mold would indicate that this is very old, if not primeval, woodland. This woodland is a dreamy place. The sun does not shine there in summer and the snow sifts softly down in winter.

The hard rolled gravel road that runs through these woods show few wheel tracks, and days and days pass without anybody moving there, except a watchman going his lonely round.”

Arlington National Cemetery is so closely associated with honoring military service that casual visitors often wonder why so many of the headstones in its Section 27 are inscribed “citizen” or “civilian,” and why these are grouped together. The answer is that, except for its particular location, the establishment of the cemetery was a purely practical measure undertaken at the height of the Civil War to accommodate deceased from the District of Columbia. While most of the cemetery’s Civil War-era graves are those of thousands of soldiers who died in the city’s military hospitals, after the conflict the Quartermaster Department used it to reinter soldiers and civilian government employees and dependents from as far as 40 miles away in Maryland, from all points of Virginia, and even locations down the coast. But almost as soon as it opened, Arlington also became a final resting place for another group of individuals: African American civilians, mostly residents of Washington, D.C. and mostly native to Virginia and Maryland, impoverished, and only recently free.¹

African Americans recognized sooner than most whites that the war brought the Jubilee, the day the enslaved would be released from bondage. The trickle that had made their way north with the Underground Railroad became a flood, particularly as the Second Confiscation Act took effect and Union troops cleared more of the border and coastal areas of opposing armies. The breakdown of enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Act and increasing sympathy with the enslaved also lured hundreds of runaways from Maryland, a loyal slaveholding state. Washington was already home to a large, free-black community, plus thousands newly freed by a unique program of compensated emancipation enacted by Congress in 1862. At about 14,000 persons in 1860, the District of Columbia’s African-American population would increase to more than 27,000 by early 1866 and 43,000 in 1870.²

The wartime influx of troops, former slaves, government employees, office-seekers, entrepreneurs, criminals, camp followers and hangers-on overwhelmed Washington’s municipal authorities, and taxpayers lacked the will and capacity to extend public services to these outsiders. The city would look after its own paupers, but not soldiers or other strangers. As a consequence, the U.S. military assumed many traditionally municipal functions. Among these was the burial of recently arrived, destitute freedpeople. From June 1862 to April 1864, there were 700 deaths just among the 5,000 African Americans who passed through Camp Barker, the city’s principal refugee camp.³

² United States Census, Population Schedules for the District of Columbia, 1860 and 1870; June 1866 report of Brevet Brigadier General Charles H. Howard in Letters Sent by the Assistant Commissioner for the District of Columbia, June 1865-Dec 1868, Entry 449 in Record Group 105, Records of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, National Archives and Records Administration. The numbers, especially those between the federal censuses, have to be seen as very approximate. One newspaper estimate put the population at almost 39,000 at the end of 1867. Less than two years before, a Freedmen’s Bureau census put the number of African Americans in the District at 27,287, but lly undercounted freedpeople. Other Bureau correspondence from about the same time put it variously at 24,000, 27,000 and 31,000.

³ Register of Freedmen at Camp Barker, D.C., June 1862-December 1863, Entry 570 of Records of the Assistant Commissioner for the District of Columbia, in Record Group 105, Records of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, National Archives and Records Administration; interview of D.B. Nichols by the American Freedmen’s Inquiry Commission in Letters Received, 1861-1870, Entry 12 in Record Group 94, Records of the Adjutant General, National Archives and Records Administration. This is a rate of almost one out of seven people within a very short period—which hints at the terrible conditions in camp—but there is evidence to suggest some double counting of deaths.

In 1862 the military authorities contracted with Frank T. Sands to “bury the dead of the army in the vicinity” and at least some of the recently arrived former slaves.⁴ Soldiers were first interred at the six-acre graveyard at the U.S. Military Asylum or Old Soldiers’ Home, although victims of “eruptive” diseases such as smallpox and measles were carted from the Kalorama Hospital to the distant Columbian Harmony Cemetery (commonly called “Harmony”) beginning in February 1863. At the same time, burials of African Americans also shifted to Harmony from Union Cemetery, located “near the boundary [now Florida Avenue], between 9th and 14th streets” — possibly a combination and expansion of adjacent Catholic and Methodist cemeteries in the city’s northwest quadrant.⁵

The 1863 contract to inter impoverished freedpeople was awarded to Dr. George Washington Scollay, who styled himself “U.S. Undertaker” for the District of Columbia and operated from an office on Pennsylvania Avenue near 3rd Street, NW. There he received burial orders from Washington’s Assistant Depot Quartermaster, Captain Edward L. Hartz. In 1864, however, the Quartermaster Department assumed interment duties directly, again employing Frank Sands, but now as an official “Superintendent of Burials” under Assistant Quartermaster for the Department of Washington James M. Moore.⁶ During that year, the authorities closed the Soldiers’ Home Cemetery, now filled, and ceased burial of most non-smallpox dead at Harmony. Union Cemetery had received more than 1,000 African-American deceased in just four and a half months, and their graves at Harmony Cemetery numbered 2,711 over a year and a half.⁷ The Army now looked across the Potomac River for more space.

Harmony continued to be used by the Freedmen’s Bureau, and possibly the Army, after the war, especially for smallpox patients. Period newspaper accounts and the 1878 Hopkins Atlas of Fifteen Miles Around Washington suggest that a large section of it was set off for soldiers during the war, before those burials were removed to Arlington.

⁶ Moore was a captain when assigned the cemeterial duties, but he was promoted to major and brevetted lieutenant colonel before the end of the war. Frank Sands and G.W. Scollay, who had arrived in Washington in 1861 and 1863, respectively, and set up their own undertaking businesses, partnered in 1864-1865 at 449 Pennsylvania Avenue. They were partners by the time Sands landed his second contract. Scollay, a Massachusetts native, was a resident of St. Louis, Missouri before the war. By 1862 he had patented an “air-tight deodorizing burial case” and created several other types of “sanitary” and traveling coffins. It is said that he embalmed soldiers in the field at Gettysburg and around Richmond. He returned to St. Louis in 1866, then moved to New York City, leaving a short-lived office of his Scollay Burial Case Company in Washington. He later invented two methods of embalming involving the injection of “gaseous compounds,” and he secured other chemical patents as late as the 1890s. Frank Sands apparently left Washington in 1866 but is buried at Congressional Cemetery there. He is perhaps most notable for having accompanied President Lincoln’s body in its great rail-borne funeral cortège. In 1862 Congress empowered President Lincoln to acquire land for interment of the war dead, and one of the earliest national cemeteries was established that year at nearby Alexandria, Virginia. With the closure of the graveyard at the Old Soldiers' Home, burials also commenced in mid May 1864 across the river on the "Arlington" estate of Confederate General Robert E. Lee. It was not until a month later, however, that Secretary of War Stanton, on the advice of Quartermaster General Montgomery C. Meigs, officially designated Lee's mansion site and up to 200 surrounding acres a military cemetery.⁸ The choice of location was not accidental. Meigs bitterly resented Lee as a traitor, and while the rebel chieftain eluded the Army of the Potomac, Lee could literally be struck where he lived: a lifelong home of his wife, vulnerable and within sight of the War Department. Burials at Arlington would be convenient to Washington via the Aqueduct Bridge, and the graves of Union soldiers and the formerly enslaved would spoil the setting of Lee's hilltop Greek Revival house, occupy the cultivable land, and even taint the ground water. Almost a decade later, the general recalled that,

In establishing the cemetery... it was my intention to have begun the interments nearer the mansion, but opposition on the part of officers stationed at Arlington, some of whom used the mansion and who did not like to have the dead buried near them caused the interments without my personal knowledge to be begun in the Northeastern quarter of the grounds near the Alexandria road.... On discovering this by a visit I gave special instructions to make the burials near the mansion. They were then driven off by the same influence to the Western portion of the grounds.⁹

His motives were revealed in correspondence between his subordinates: "The Quartermaster General, having some time ago expressed his regret that interments had not been made in close proximity to the Arlington House, Va., so as to more firmly secure the grounds known as the National Cemetery, to the Government by rendering it undesirable as a future residence or homestead. There being more than a thousand interments yet to be made, the views of the Quartermaster General can now be carried out."¹⁰

As Meigs indicated, the burial of soldiers had commenced May 13, 1864 well downhill and "as far from the residence as possible.... [in a] spot bordering on a little rivulet and marsh," at the direction of Brigadier General Gustavus Adolphus DeRussy, commander of the defenses of Washington south of the Potomac and headquartered in the Custis-Lee home. The first burials, at the front or eastern edge of today's Section 27, nearest the northeast gate, were of white Union soldiers, although there are several government employees and dependents among them. As the number of black troops increased, they became increasingly represented

At the end of the war, the Quartermaster Department produced thousands of plans of Army facilities as a way of accounting for them and preparing for their continued use, transfer, or sale. An elevation of the main sexton's lodge, seen in the background of the photograph on the preceding page, was rendered in full color. It was here that remains were received and the burial records were kept. An accompanying plan of this corner of the cemetery, seen at right, depicts not only the lodge, but also the gravediggers' kitchen and mess room, their privies, and the wood fence that originally enclosed the parcel. among the military dead, and interments of black soldiers at Arlington began soon after. And about July 2 or 3, the new cemetery became the primary burying ground for Washington's freedpeople receiving federal assistance. Once Meigs's orders were finally heeded and graves were dug behind the house, there were no further burials of whites in this original plot, and the remains of many white soldiers were removed. But from that time, and continuing after the war, the burial of black soldiers and civilians continued, although many of these were reinterments from other graveyards.¹¹ Burials of civilians in Section 27 slowed in 1867 and ceased that November, but the reinterment of black troops continued into 1868, and there are a few much later graves of soldiers or veterans.¹²

It is often assumed that the African-American civilians of Section 27 had been residents of nearby Freedman's Village, which stood in what is now the south end of the cemetery. The Quartermaster Department founded the village in 1864 as a model rural community intended to relieve the city of Washington of the overcrowding of freedpeople and to return fallow farmland to production. But Freedman's Village had its own graveyard, and the names of the deceased from that settlement and nearby camps do not appear in Arlington.¹³ Rather, for reasons of cemetery overcrowding in the District of Columbia, the federal government established a necropolis north of the village. Arlington thus became the site of the largest Civil War cemetery of Washington and perhaps the city's second largest potter's field.

Not all of Section 27's freedpeople had been Washington residents. A sizable number had perished of smallpox in the vicinity of Alexandria and were first buried at the Claremont Eruptive Fever Hospital in Fairfax County.¹⁴ Nearly 200 black teamsters and laborers for the Quartermaster Department, mostly Marylanders and ranging in age from 14 to 72, were reinterred at Arlington from a burying ground near the cavalry depot at Giesboro in the southeast corner of the District.

The process for the burial of poor freedpeople at Arlington began with a family member or friend of the deceased making application to the Quartermaster Department. They generally had to show that the family was without the means to bury their own. In taking the poorest of the poor, Section 27 was different from wartime cemeteries for freedpeople in nearby Alexandria, for instance, which interred nearly all of that town's former slaves. The Quartermaster

Many of the troops' remains came from Washington's Harmony Cemetery, smaller plots near Forts Reno and DeRussy, and Virginia's Camp Casey, a recruiting and training camp for the U.S. Colored Troops located near Freedman's Village, plus many other locations.

¹² The latest few date to the 1930s. Some civilian gravestones are erroneously inscribed with turn-of-the-twentieth-century dates. The source of this mistake is unclear, but these are at least third-generation markers.

¹³ The claim that Section 27 is mostly populated by former residents of Freedmen's Village has been repeated for decades, perhaps most recently in a December 2011 report to Congress by the Arlington National Cemetery Gravesite Accountability Task Force. Only after the burial of Washington's poorest freedpeople at Arlington ceased did the superintendent of Freedman's Village, an officer of the postwar Freedmen's Bureau, request that its burials be removed to Arlington Cemetery, with further interments to take place there. But the Quartermaster Department resisted the Bureau's proposal, concerned about cost and the now overwhelmingly military character of the cemetery. The Depot Quartermaster questioned why poor whites, too, would not then also have to be buried there. "[I]t will certainly lead to abuse and trouble." Even in those rare instances that deceased individuals at Arlington Cemetery and from Freedman's Village coincidentally share the same name, the death dates do not match—and there is often a Washington address for the former. The location of the Freedman's Village burying ground is a mystery, although it was possibly an expansion of a pre-war slave cemetery. A related question is, where are the graves of the residents of the freedpeople's barracks on nearby Mason's Island? Like the Freedman's Villagers, the names of their deceased do not appear in Section 27. It is likely then that there is a graveyard on the island, now known as Roosevelt Island. There were at least a couple of burials of black soldiers or recruits at nearby Camp Casey in 1863. H.N. Howard, Superintendent of Freedman's Village, to Brevet Brigadier General Charles H. ¹⁴ The Claremont reinterments are nearly all recorded here as unknowns, because their original headboards had been removed or were illegible when the remains were exhumed. The names of most of the hospital's dead are now known, however, but they cannot be matched to particular graves. The reburial records identify many—most probably erroneously—as government employees. Department would issue an order to requisition a coffin and an ambulance and to provide a grave at the cemetery. The cemetery's sexton would see to the burial and record it in the cemetery register and in his daily and monthly reports. But not all of Washington's freedpeople who received burial aid were interred in a government-controlled cemetery. As assistance was based on financial need, some people requested only a coffin or transportation of the remains. Occasionally, family friends might purchase a coffin for burial at Arlington or pay for the interment entirely. Many instead acquired a plot in a private or family cemetery, preferring that to a more impersonal and often more distant federal burying ground; during the war, a Washingtonian would need to obtain a pass to cross the river to visit Arlington. In the year 1865, the number of coffins furnished monthly by the Quartermaster Department to D.C. freedpeople varied from 77 to 120.¹⁵ After the war, some of the coffins may have been built by the carpenter and staff at Freedman's Village.¹⁶ By that time, much of the cemetery's white labor force had been replaced by freedmen, as unemployment was a severe problem for the area's now huge African-American population. Among the earliest gravediggers were Freedman's Village residents Thomas Owens, Benjamin Green and John Wells, and a neighbor, James Parks, a former Arlington slave.¹⁷

After the war, the responsibility for aiding poor freedpeople passed to the new Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, but the Quartermaster continued to conduct burials from Washington until mid September 1867.¹⁸ While most of the Bureau's Washington burial records have not survived, the deaths of a handful of these individuals are recorded in a postwar municipal death register. This register indicates that during 1867 increasing numbers of the deceased were laid to rest in other cemeteries.

In mid 1867 the African Americans in Section 27 were reported to number 3,540. Later, the total was put at 3,639, which is pretty close to the number of black civilians represented in the table below. More than 1,000 were laid to rest in 1864 alone, with 1,391 civilian freedpeople buried from August 1864 through June 1865. Their graves line both sides of Ord and Weitzel Drive, between the 1870s red-sandstone north wall of the cemetery and the former stream, now diverted underground. Section 27 also includes the area on the hillock surrounding the brick lodge that replaced the original frame one by the turn of the century. Each grave was marked "with a neat head board 2 feet high painted white, with black letters giving the name, [and if a soldier the] rank, Company, Regiment, and date of death where known, in other cases the word 'Unknown' is painted on the head board. The distance from the center of head board in one direction is four (4) feet, and in the other ten feet-six inches... making the width of the plot 21 feet. The main walks are six (6) feet wide, and the walks between each plot four (4) feet..."¹⁹

The irregular shape of the section, bisected by the lane, created uneven row lengths. A section/block/range/grave numbering system was soon adopted to locate burials, with African Americans separated from whites (see page 23). That organization was superseded by the present grave numbering system, presumably adopted in the late 1870s, which consolidated the numerous, irregular sections into one. The numbers ascend as the rows zigzag across the drive toward the rear of the section—with the exception of those graves that were moved for the creation of the “new” lodge and alterations to the site drainage. The cemetery’s present section-numbering system dates to the twentieth century.

Becoming a place of interment mainly for black civilians, Section 27 retained a distinct identity for many years. As the overall burying ground expanded, the sexton’s morning reports for Section 27 were turned in on forms printed with the heading “Contraband Cemetery, Arlington, Va.,” instead of the “Arlington National Cemetery” that appeared on the forms for the military burials up the hill.²⁰ The Freedmen’s Bureau sometimes referred to it as the “Freedmens Cemetery.”²¹ There was also less care taken to the retention of burial records for the civilians.²² A published 1901 plan of the cemetery depicts Section 27 as a lonely corner, separated from the predominantly military sections by woods.²³ This perceived difference in status resulted in requests from the Grand Army of the Republic and local African-American veterans that the rest of the soldiers and sailors of both races “now buried in the lower or contraband cemetery at Arlington, be removed from thence and buried in the cemetery proper,” then also known as the “upper cemetery.”²⁴ The groups would later agitate for a memorial, but none was erected, until a group of descendants and “friends”, comprising a “Committee to Memorialize African Americans of the Civil War” placed a plaque in the 1992.²⁵

Many of the first pine headboards had deteriorated enough by the summer of 1867 to warrant replacement, a process that continued, at a rate of several each month, for the next decade.²⁶ Although the boards were cheap, their repeated provision and constant maintenance did not make economic sense over the long

Meigs, April 7, 1873, and Superintendent Thompson R. East to Adjutant General Lorenzo Thomas, August 31, 1868, in Record Group 92, Entry 576. The Quartermaster General’s recommendation to the Secretary of War was that: “the soldiers once buried within the limits of the National Military Cemetery at Arlington should not be disturbed. The whole enclosure is a National Cemetery, and the colored soldiers buried now together give evidence of the death of many of their race in the struggle for freedom, while scattered among the white soldiers, their number being small comparatively, they would be comparatively unnoticed. I do not suppose that any body of their friends deliberately approves of certain complaints which have come to my notice against the present location on the ground that others of their race, equally sacrificed in the attempt to obtain freedom, but many of them feeble from age or sex, who died and were buried by the United States during the war, lie in the same part of the grounds. All these were victims of the struggle.” “As for the disinterment & removal now proposed I think that there are objections to it in sentiment as well as in the expense, but all care for the dead is for the notice of the living and if the col’d people generally prefer to have their comrades who fought for them taken up again & scattered among the white it can be done.... If it be ordered that all those buried in this part of the grounds shall be moved or that only the remains of those that died as soldiers... shall be moved, it can be done, though I regret always to move a body once interred in a Nat’l Cem’y, believing that the dead once decently buried should have rest....” Montgomery C. Meigs draft letter to William W. Belknap, April 11, 1873, Record Group 92, Entry 576.

run. At the beginning of 1874, they were described as “rotting off fast,” but it was not until 1877 that the cemetery staff undertook their wholesale replacement with something permanent.²⁷

Two standard markers had been adopted in 1873 for use in national cemeteries in response to an Act of Congress requiring a headstone at each soldier’s grave. Despite Meigs’s preference for a cheaper, cast-iron marker, Secretary of War William Belknap specified the use of marble or granite slabs, four by ten inches and one foot tall, with an arched top and an inscription on the front. Another, smaller, block-like model was used only for unknowns and inscribed with just a number chiseled into the top surface.²⁸ While the oldest, civilian gravestones are of these types, it is not certain that they were placed simultaneously with those for the soldiers, because the cemetery’s superintendent had initially proposed removing all markers from Section 27.

The headboards are decaying rapidly, give the place an unsightly appearance and add much to the difficulty of maintaining the grounds in good condition and as they are not likely to be replaced by new headboards I respectfully suggest that they be entirely removed. These interments have been made with considerable accuracy of measurement, and a correct map of these sections has been prepared, showing the exact location of each grave, the name of its occupant, &c so that no difficulty would be experienced in finding any individual grave.²⁹

It is unknown if Section 27 was ever bare, but even the civilians ultimately received military-style headstones. The removal of the first markers would help explain subsequent confusion. A combination of human error and the deterioration of the headboards had already proved sufficient to lose information and confuse grave locations. Despite claims that records were complete and exact, a civilian employee of the Quartermaster Department, preparing the “correct map” referred to above, reported in 1873 that, on examining the ‘Record Book’ of interments at ‘Arlington Cemetery,’ as well as the numbers painted on the Head-stones of the graves, [I find] that there was an utter want of regularity in their numbering—reference being had to the Section and Range—so much so, that the Superintendent finds great difficulty, if not impossibility in determining, from the Record Book, the location of any desired grave. In view of the above facts, I would respectfully suggest, that as I am now engaged in making a Plot of the Cemetery, that I be authorized to place on the Plot the correct number on each grave, and that the record book be made to conform to it.³⁰

²⁸ The earliest markers include the shield type that was adopted in 1873 and that are now found in their greatest concentration in the area behind the lodge. An equally old type is the low, roughly six-inch-square block employed for unknowns (as at Graves 1210 through 1220, for example) and discontinued in 1903. There are now many types and periods of stones in Section 27 and elsewhere. One of two 1901 maps of Arlington National Cemetery. Section 27, then designated Section D-30, is located along the northern extreme of the property, the lower right in this image. It was then still separated from the bulk of the Civil War and Spanish-American War burials by a stream and woods. The location of the cemetery's northeast gate has since shifted, and the landscaped roundabouts have been eliminated.

This “Record Book” is probably the register still held by the cemetery, a roughly alphabetical list of interments in Section 27. It appears to have been compiled beginning in late 1867 because it includes, in the same handwriting and ink, records of all the civilian and military burials to that time, plus a handful of soldier reinterments inserted later. It is also associated with Asa Peabody Blunt, Quartermaster in charge of Washington’s Lincoln Depot at the national cemeteries in the region from March 1867 through February 1869. Consulted for all the individuals in the table below (beginning on page 30), this register seems to have been compiled from several books or lists, one for each of the original sections or blocks of this “lower” cemetery.³¹

No effort to rectify or recreate the records could succeed entirely. Many of the burial orders and reports have been lost over the years, including those for most of the earliest interments of African Americans. As burial requests and sexton’s vouchers and reports were typically bundled by month, when such records were later lost, entire months disappeared. The cemetery map or “plot” referenced above has also not been located. Further, many of the markers have been replaced over the last century and a half. Such replacement, and economy in the inscriptions, created opportunities for errors to creep in, resulting in the loss of parts of names and frequently introducing errors of spelling. Maintenance parties also occasionally placed a new stone in the wrong spot, and several of the soldiers’ markers are not readily identified as such.³² The Department of Veterans Affairs’ web-based “Nationwide Gravesite Locator” database entries for Arlington appear to be derived from the inscriptions on the stones more than from earlier textual sources, and it occasionally adds its own mistakes in names or grave numbers, having had to rely upon often worn inscriptions.

The records of the 1860s had their own problems. Some of the Quartermaster employees and cemetery staff were barely literate and made spelling mistakes, omitted information, or provided vague descriptions. Initially misspelled names might be corrected down the line, but the earliest sources contained the more likely correct names and the most complete personal information, with data lost or straying from burial request to burial order, from sexton’s voucher to sexton’s report to burial register, and from headboards to gravestones.³³ The circa 1867 burial register is the most comprehensive source, as it contains names and burial dates of nearly all known civilians, but little other personal information. Even this early source contains errors, including duplicate grave locations for different individuals, and multiple entries with suspiciously similar names and death dates. Another burial register, apparently compiled after the cemetery’s first stones were set in 1877, lacks death or burial dates for the civilians but still often offers more information than do the headstones—such as many full first names. This latter register also contains a couple of instances of possible duplicate stones and several of the more typical errors of substituting the name of the parent for that of a deceased child.³⁴

³² Ellen Gray’s stone, for instance, is missing from her Grave 3080, as the replacement marker was instead placed next to Grave 2080. Mary Bowles/Rowles has markers at Graves 2553 and 2370. And there are far too many coincidences of similar names on stones only one or two graves apart, such as the S. Brown and Simon Brown at Graves 1775 and 1776; L. Johnson and Louisa Johnson at 3932 and 3933; Isaac Charity at 3978 and 3979; Adam Curtis at 4891 and 4894; and William Brooks with two adjacent stones both marked 4080. These occurrences suggest that mix-ups have produced duplicate markers, meaning that the deceased beneath one of each pair is now effectively an unknown. A couple of stones of next-door graves may have been switched over the years. Several named stones that do not indicate affiliation with the military are nonetheless over soldiers’ graves. These include the markers for Issac Banion, Henry Calfus, John W. Broomfield, Simon Moore and Manuel Walker, to name a few. There are also at least a couple of stones (at Graves 1747 and 1753, for instance) that are marked as unknown citizens, when in fact they are over soldiers’ burials. Because many of the deceased were infants, perhaps the most common error on stones is an inscription such as “Jane Doe,” when the burial is actually the child of Jane Doe. A small number of burials with missing or “unknown” stones have been identified in the present study.

³³ And, one might add, to replacement gravestones and the Nationwide Gravesite Locator database—and the present compilation.

It was recognized as early as the 1860s that there had been some careless mistakes. Sexton O.H.O. Hopper complained to the Quartermaster Department's recorder of deaths about his predecessor's errors: "I find that all those colored Soldiers buried here have been numbered wrong. There are but very few right what is to be done about it?"³⁵ An order for coffins that predated the cemetery was addressed to Superintendent of Burials Frank Sands with a parenthetical gibe "who don't fix his papers."³⁶ The compiler of the following table hopes that he has not introduced too many mistakes of his own in attempting to synthesize and "fix" these papers. It is further hoped that the data will be of use to genealogists and others studying Washington's African Americans of the Civil War era, perhaps shedding light on their origins, occupations, health, and neighborhood settlement. Keep in mind that their association with impoverished freedpeople, mostly not natives of Washington, renders the records less than a complete or representative sample of the entire African-American community. A soon-to-be-published companion piece, containing data on African-American deaths in Washington between 1862 and 1867, will provide a slightly larger, if still skewed and overlapping, sample.

Looking at the numbers of burials monthly, one notes a trend of gradual decline, interrupted by dramatic spikes. The initially high numbers presumably illustrate General Meigs's keen interest in directing as many burials as possible to Arlington, because the subsequent drop is harder to explain. While the death rate did fall late in the war, the number of Washington's freedpeople was simultaneously rising. The falling numbers later indicate a dwindling commitment of the Quartermaster Department and Freedmen's Bureau, combined with the freedpeople's desire to bury their own in places of their choosing; after the war, only those freedpeople who received rations, housing or employment from the Bureau were still buried at its direction. A spike in mid 1865 coincides with a jump in postwar arrivals to the District, as well as the founding of a new Freedmen's Hospital, which sent deceased to Arlington. Another, during the summer of 1866 shows re-interments from Claremont Hospital and the Giesboro cemetery. In 1867 we see the last gasp of the Freedmen's Bureau's efforts, plus re-interments from Harmony, and another group from Freedmen's Hospital. Still, relatively few people had been treated in a hospital; most succumbed to illness in their homes—some in postwar freedmen's barracks.

Place of Death

Sex of the Deceased

Even excluding soldiers from consideration, significantly more males than females were buried in Section 27. Male slaves appear to have escaped or migrated to Washington in greater numbers during the war, frequently sending for their families after. The government also took responsibility for burying the many laborers in its employ, and, with the exception of a substantial number of cooks, nurses, cleaning women and laundresses, most freedpeople employed by the government were men. Government employees are probably represented among the dead in numbers greater than reported.

The table of the deceased is uneven in its documentation of individuals, but for no one is it extensive. Until recently, one burial was thought to be well known, William H. Johnson at Grave 3346.³⁷ A William H. Johnson had accompanied Abraham Lincoln from Springfield, Illinois as his barber and valet. He also carried messages for the wartime Treasury Department. Johnson contracted smallpox, likely from the President himself, and died before January 28, 1864. Lincoln paid for Johnson's coffin. Since 1972, a story has circulated that Johnson was buried at Arlington, as there is a stone inscribed with the name.³⁸ But it was a common enough name, and there are at least three problems with this accepted account.³⁹ First, Columbian Harmony cemetery was the typical resting place for an African-American smallpox victim of the period. Second, the 1867-1868 burial register has Arlington's William H. Johnson's death or burial date as June 28, 1865, more than seventeen months too late—indeed, six weeks after the president's own death—and consistent with the dates of the surrounding burials. Third and most persuasive is the fact that Arlington National Cemetery did not open until three and a half months after Lincoln's servant had died—and it did not open to African-American civilian burials until an additional month and a half had passed.⁴⁰

As with the other types of personal information, the causes of death are far from complete. Although the proximate causes were typically symptoms of bacterial or viral infections, the main cause of death could truly be said to be poverty. Living in cramped, overcrowded quarters lacking running water or sanitary facilities, often lacking fuel or, alternatively, heated by smoky, open fires, the war's refugees and runaways contracted pneumonia and tuberculosis, smallpox, typhoid fever, diphtheria, cholera, and many other afflictions. The large number of stillbirths may be attributable to the health of the mothers. And after weaning, infants were particularly susceptible to food- or water-borne germs and frequently perished with fevers, diarrhea and convulsions. While statistics have to be taken with a grain of salt, given the spottiness of the records, the available sample of deceased with reported ages indicates that most civilian interments were children.⁴¹ Including stillbirths, the median age of the sample of more than 500 individuals is a remarkable ten years old. To characterize the typical occupant of Section 27, the headstone pictured on the next page says it all.

³⁹ There are two other black, civilian William Johnsons in Section 27 alone.

⁴⁰ The handful of civilian re-interments from Harmony cemetery did not occur until after the war. One might argue that the death or burial date is simply wrong, but it is very unlikely that a reinterment of Johnson would land him among Arlington burials that were made at the same time as the death date given in the Arlington register. Some recent works accord a special significance to the fact that the Arlington gravestone is inscribed "citizen." Of course, this William Johnson's burial is hardly alone in that regard. It must be remembered that the first stones were placed at Arlington no earlier than 1877, well after the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. And this is not the original stone, but a modern replacement.

Although separated by little more than the perimeter wall from busy Jefferson Davis Highway, today's Section 27 is far removed from the commotion of Memorial Bridge, the cemetery's visitors center and Arlington House. What was once the entirety of Arlington cemetery is now a quiet corner receiving relatively few visitors, mostly locals strolling for exercise and to take in the beauty of the spot. The marsh has long been drained and the rivulet diverted and confined to culverts. The bosk has given way to the axe and to thousands more headstones in a rolling greensward among widely spaced oaks, beeches and spring-blossoming ornamentals.⁴² Some kind soul has periodically remembered the unknowns by laying smooth river pebbles atop their headstones. These formerly enslaved people now slumber in a peace they had never known in life.

The below table of the deceased African-American civilians of Arlington's Section 27 is composed of the following nine columns:

Names

Individuals are listed alphabetically by surname, or by first name when no surname is known. Unknown persons are simply identified as "Unknown."⁴³ A few names have been corrected for obvious misspellings, but most appear as written. Many records may offer name or spelling variants. These are indicated below within parentheses. Likely correct spellings are sometimes suggested in brackets.

The names of many individuals were unknown to those who recorded their deaths or burials. Many of these were sudden deaths or reinterments. Others may have been known at the time of death but their names went unrecorded or were later lost. Most of those reinterred from the Claremont smallpox hospital cemetery in Fairfax County are now known, but they cannot be matched to particular graves (see footnote 14). A number of table entries for unknowns are duplicates as, lacking a unique name, a known grave number and a burial date, those from the burial records could often not be matched with particular "unknown" grave inscriptions. Presumably, those unknowns for whom only an original grave number is known largely correspond with those for whom only a modern grave number is known, but because many of these burials have been moved, matching them up is not easily done. Although soldiers' graves have been excluded from the following table as beyond the scope of study, it has not been determined that all the remaining unknowns were civilians—just as several soldiers' graves are not marked to indicate military service. The block-type markers that hold only a grave number have been assumed to be soldiers and excluded, as their locations do not match civilian burials recorded in the 1867 register, and as they tend to be surrounded by identified soldier's graves.

Users are encouraged to browse or to use the "find" function to search for a particular surname or given name.

Date of Burial, etc.

Nearly all of the records below contain a date of death or burial (or of burial order or report), and many have both. Available death dates are recorded in the "Notes" section. Dates should not be presumed exact for several reasons. First, there are mistakes and contradictions among the records, although there is also some degree of corroboration. Second, most of the records were not prepared on the dates of death or burial. Although the District of Columbia municipal records cited below are described as "interments," and some may be, other records suggest that they are usually dates of death and they are so set down below.⁴⁴

⁴³ Again, many gravestones of unknowns are so inscribed; others are simply small blocks containing just the grave number. The latter may have been used exclusively for soldiers.

The dates in the 1867-1868 cemetery register were intended to be death dates but are probably mostly burial dates, as they are sometimes corroborated by other records, and are recorded as such here. Cemetery staff would not necessarily have had access to information about deaths, and an order for the national cemeteries' staffs to retain death dates came only in 1867, after most of the war-era burials had occurred. On the other hand, for many of the reinterments, the registrar clearly did have knowledge of the original death or burial date.

Occasionally, the circa 1867 register recorded only the month in which the death occurred. And a handful of individuals have only approximate dates offered by the compiler, consistent with the dates of burials around them. These are followed by a question mark.

Burials typically took place the day after death, although some occurred the same day. Occasionally, they were delayed as much as a week. Some individuals have two burial dates, as they were re-interred within the period of study.

Present Grave Number

The simple numbering of Grave 1 through Grave 5199 (with some stones having an additional "A" or "B," etc., following the numeral) runs more or less consecutively from the front, or east end, of Section 27 to the rear or west end, continuing in rows that wind back and forth across the drive. This progression only very roughly reflects the sequence of the burials, as it obscures an earlier organization of smaller, irregularly sized and shaped sections. A number of graves were moved because of alterations to the site drainage and the construction of a new lodge.⁴⁵ The present numbering appears to have been adopted in 1877, well after wartime interments had ceased and as the first permanent headstones were set. The user may employ the "find" function to search for a particular grave by number.

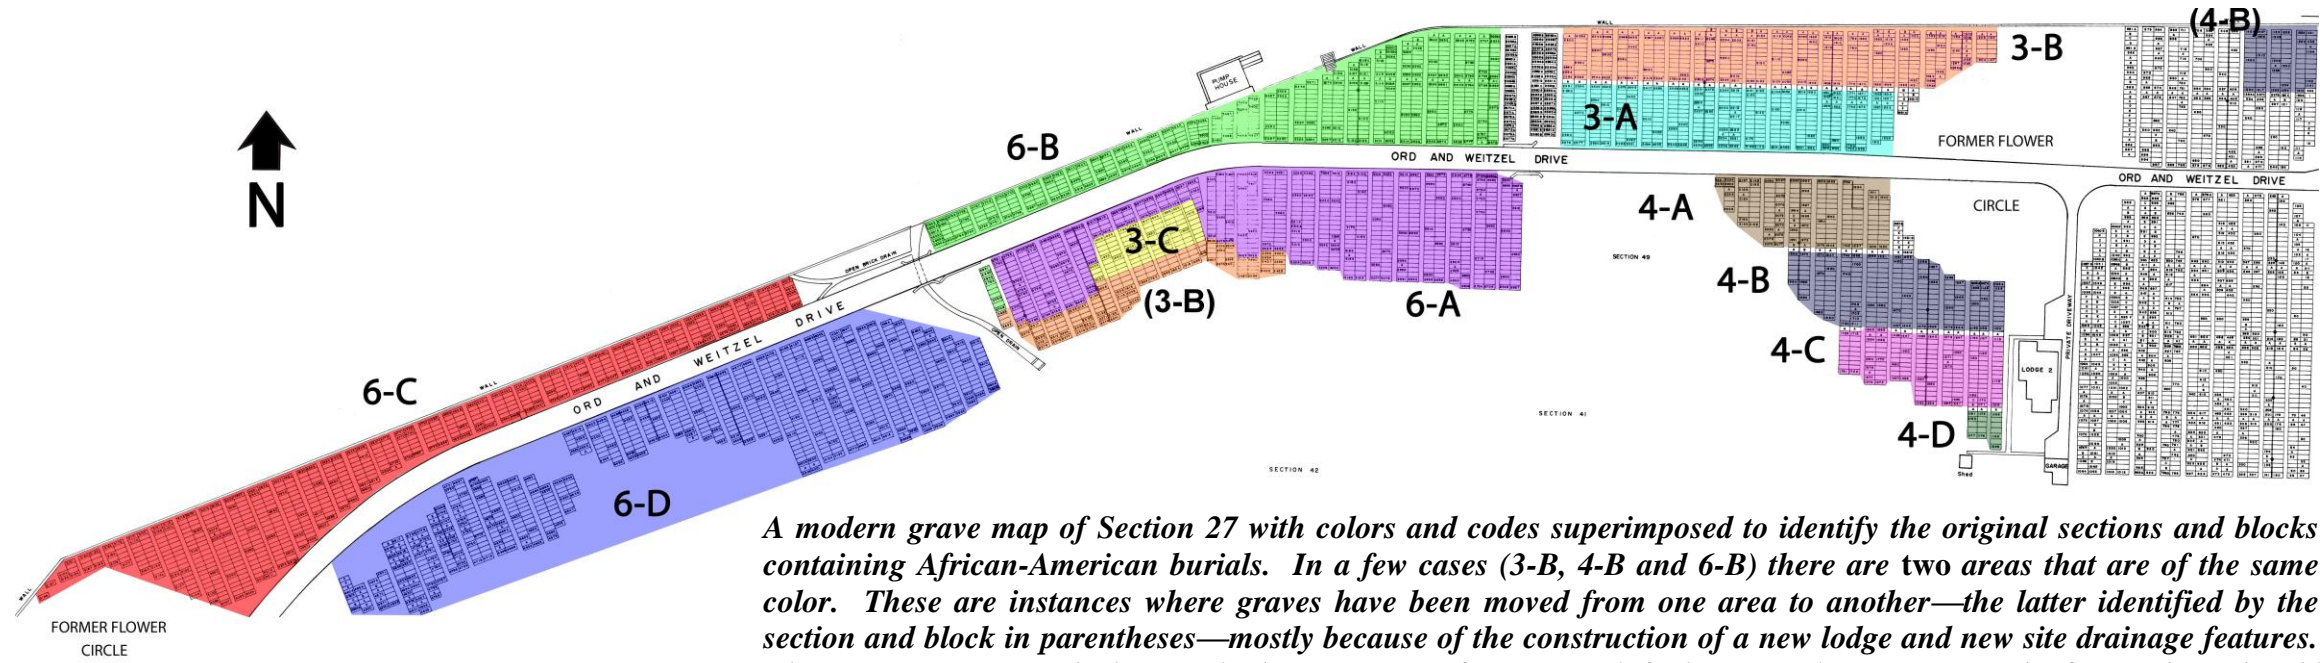

If most or all of a particular headstone is missing, the notation "[no marker]" follows the grave number. The African-American civilians all appear to have graves numbered higher than 1000. There are a few civilian graves numbered lower, but these are presumably all white government employees and dependents. The grave numbers followed by letters appear to be later burials, either postwar deaths or reinterments from within the cemetery, often filling in aisles or around edges, including at the margin of the former stream that formed the section's south boundary.

A few numbers appear in brackets. These are graves for which there are no markers, but their presence is implied by a gap or broken stone and the fact that there was an original grave number for that spot (see "Original Grave Number" below). The compiler has thus created a "new" grave number (followed by "-A") for each of these, between the identified graves on either side.

⁴⁵ Many of the burials in the northeasternmost corner of the section, for instance, have been moved and thus appear out of order. See the map on the next page. Their location corresponds to the site of the original lodge, and they may have been relocated when the new lodge replaced it.

Original Grave Number, etc.

The predominantly African-American portion of Section 27 was originally arranged into alphanumerically designated sections and blocks (3-B, 4-D, etc.), then into two-row-deep ranges and individual graves (with a couple of multiple burials in single graves). There are a few conflicts between the old and new number orders where burials have been moved or replacement stones are out of place. Several original grave numbers were determined by interpolation. There are a few entries with only an original grave number and no present-day one. Explanations for these instances include the possible removal of some remains to other graveyards and, of course, mistakes in recordkeeping and gravestone placement that resulted in burials essentially being lost within this cemetery.

A modern grave map of Section 27 with colors and codes superimposed to identify the original sections and blocks containing African-American burials. In a few cases (3-B, 4-B and 6-B) there are two areas that are of the same color. These are instances where graves have been moved from one area to another—the latter identified by the section and block in parentheses—mostly because of the construction of a new lodge and new site drainage features. The entire Section 3, Block C (and a large portion of 3-B) was shifted westward to a point south of 6-A, along the old stream bank. Much of 4-B was relocated to the site of the original sexton’s lodge. The graves at the far right that are not tinted are those of white troops, government employees and dependents, a clear illustration of the fact that the cemetery was originally racially segregated. Other graves not colored in are later (presumably 1867 and after) military burials. Base map courtesy of Arlington National Cemetery and the U.S. Army.

Age

Ages at death are provided if they appear in the original records. The numerals indicate age in years, unless the months, weeks or days are specified. Naturally, some ages were known and recorded exactly. On the other hand, many formerly enslaved persons did not know their exact dates of birth, so ages, especially when expressed in round numbers, are often estimates, and sometimes the estimates of people unacquainted with the deceased. Often an age range is suggested by a description such as “old,” “man,” “woman,” “boy,” “girl,” “child,” “infant.”

Complaint or Cause of Death

The cause of death or the illness from which the individual suffered at the time of death is often stated. Sometimes, multiple illnesses are recorded, occasionally indicating a mistake, but more often describing concurrent conditions, related symptoms, or an overarching and a proximate cause of death. Keep in mind that diagnoses were subject to the limitations and the terminology of contemporary medicine. The diseases have generally been set forth below as they appear in the records, with a couple of exceptions for consistency. Instances of “dentition” have been recorded below as the more commonly reported “teething,” once thought to be a common cause of infant mortality. Cases of variola not further specified as “confluens” or “discreta” etc. have been rewritten as simply “smallpox” to join the large number reported by that more familiar name. The data cannot be taken as constituting an accurate statistical sample.

Address

This is the individual’s place of residence, place of death, or both—or at least the place where the body was to be picked up for burial. When the burial is a reinterment, the place of first burial is given as the address. Often an exact or approximate street address is given. Where possible, street addresses have been checked against period maps and directories so that, for the ease of today’s researcher, entries could be standardized according to Washington’s modern northeast/northwest/southeast/southwest quadrant system, which was not adopted until 1869.⁴⁶ Note that the house-numbering system also changed after the war, but the street numbers are given below as they appear in the original records, and they are related to the nearest cross streets. Some street names have changed (and some have disappeared), but their modern names or locations are generally given below in brackets. The following places appear below more than once each as places of death or points of reference:

⁴⁶ The lettered streets north of the National Mall and East Capitol Street were designated “north”; those to the south were called “south.” For example, there was a B Street north and a B Street south, both of which then extended across two of today’s quadrants. Similarly, the north-south numbered streets were distinguished by “east” and “west” relative to the Capitol. The present system, of course, is a combination of these cardinal directions.

Adams Row – At least one source indicates that “Adams Row” of freedpeople’s dwellings stood just off 14th Street, NW near, or perhaps in, Murder Bay. On the other hand, there were at the time “Adams shanties” on 14th Street, NW between R and S Streets, and these “many miserable shanties unfit for occupancy by human beings” may have been intended. The row stood by 1864 and at least into 1866.

Armory Square Hospital – An army general hospital, it was located at the Columbia Armory and barracks at the northeast corner of 7th and B Streets, SW on the former Reservation 17, now a portion of the National Mall.

Baltimore Depot – The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad station, it stood between New Jersey Avenue and North Capitol and C and D Streets, NW.

Bartholow’s Wharf – This was a commercial wharf at the foot of South Capitol Street around R Street, and the name was applied to the immediately surrounding area.

Camp Hayti – A camp of government laborers located in the northern portion of what is now Logan Circle, NW. The place name persisted until at least early 1866, and a largely African-American neighborhood continued in the vicinity thereafter.

Camp Krause – A camp of government laborers and scavengers located about 1,000 yards from the foot of the Navy Yard Bridge in Uniontown, across the Anacostia. It was administered by Captain Charles A. Krause. The camp remained in some form until 1867.

Campbell Hospital – See Freedmen’s Hospital.

Canal – The Washington City Canal was dug in 1815, largely along the course of Tiber Creek, to connect the Potomac and Anacostia Rivers through the center of the city of Washington. Little used at the time of the war, it had become a sewer and dumping ground before being filled in 1873. A roadway, referred to as Canal Street, ran along the northern side of the canal in the Murder Bay neighborhood.

Carver Hospital – An army general hospital located in former troop barracks on Meridian Hill, it was immediately south of Columbia Road between 14th and 15th Streets. It stood on the Columbian College grounds, north of the college buildings. The barracks were rented to freedpeople after the war.

Claremont Cemetery – This was a burying ground for soldiers and civilians adjacent to the Claremont Eruptive Fever General Hospital (1862-1865) in Fairfax County, Virginia. The hospital was located in and around the main house on the old Clermont estate, south of Cameron Run, and it treated patients from the Alexandria area.

Colored Orphans Home – The Asylum for Aged and Destitute Colored Refugees and Colored Orphans—also known as the Watson Colored Orphans Home and incorporated February 16, 1863 by Act of Congress—occupied the former “Burleith” estate of Richard S. Cox on the Georgetown Heights, the present site of the Duke Ellington School for the Arts (Western High School), 35th and R Streets, NW. It took in African-American orphans from as far as Alexandria, Virginia. It was in operation by June 1863 and had its own small burying ground. It closed in early December 1866, with the residents moved to a new building on 7th Street, NW.

Columbian College Barracks – These were postwar freedpeople’s barracks likely at the former Columbian College Hospital on the Meridian Hill campus of Columbian College, west side of 14th Street, NW and north of Florida Avenue, near the terminus of the city railroad. It is possible, however, that the name was used interchangeably with the Carver Hospital barracks located north of the college buildings.

Dupuy Hospital – Or “Hospital Dupuy,” it was a hospital at Giesboro Point, D.C. for the sick and injured Quartermaster Department employees working at or near the Giesboro cavalry depot. It was physically and administratively separate from the cavalry hospital(s) at Camp Stoneman. The dead from Dupuy were buried at the Giesboro Cemetery from 1863 to 1865.

East Capitol Street Barracks – These postwar (1866-1868) freedmen’s tenements were in former army barracks on the south side of East Capitol Street between 6th and 7th Streets.

Emory Hospital – Another army general hospital branch, it was established in July 1863 and located at B and 15th Streets, SE, east of Lincoln Hospital.

Fort Baker – One of the forts constructed during the war in a defensive ring around the capital, it was located near the present intersection of Alabama Avenue with 31st Street, SE.

Fort Bunker Hill – Another of the defenses of Washington, it stood near “Bunker Hill Road” (Michigan Avenue) between what are now 13th, 14th, Otis and Perry Streets, NE.

Fort Stevens – Another of the District’s fortifications, it guarded the Seventh Street Road, at what is now 13th and Quackenbos Streets, NW.

Freedmen’s Hospital – Although its origin was in the 1862-1864 Contraband Camp (“Camp Barker”) hospital at the southwest corner of 12th and S Streets, NW (there was an earlier or additional ward on the north side of R Street on the same square), the first hospital by this name was located for most of 1865 in barracks at the southwest side of Thomas Circle, between Vermont Avenue and M Street, NW. It was put under the control of the new Freedmen’s Bureau in 1865 and relocated to the former Campbell Hospital, just north of Florida Avenue and east of Georgia Avenue, NW. Campbell was later demolished and in 1868 began to be replaced by permanent structures. Freedmen’s Hospital became today’s Howard University Hospital.

Giesboro Cemetery – A burying ground at or near the Giesboro cavalry depot and Camp Stoneman, the dismounted cavalry camp, on Giesboro (or Giesborough) Point, now part of Joint Base Bolling-Anacostia. It was possibly attached to an earlier family cemetery and was used for the burial of Quartermaster Department laborers from October 1863 until November 1865. African-American burials there were re-interred in Section 27 of Arlington Cemetery in 1866.

Grover’s Theatre – Opened in October 1863, Leonard Grover’s playhouse stood on the north side of Pennsylvania Avenue, NW between 14th and 15th Streets.

Harmony Cemetery – Officially the Columbian Harmony Society burying ground (also known as Harmonian, Harmoneon, New Harmonia and New Harmonian—the spelling has been standardized in the table below), it was this primarily African-American cemetery’s second location. It was re-established in 1858, with reinterments from the old grounds, on Moses Kelly’s Youngsborough tract, now the Metro station and commercial area on the south side of the 800 block of Rhode Island Avenue, NE. Many black and white soldiers were buried here, mostly victims of smallpox who died at the Kalorama Hospital, but they were generally reinterred at Arlington after the war. Harmony was the principal cemetery for civilian freedpeople during 1863 and early 1864 and for smallpox victims until after the war.

Island – This was the portion of the city of Washington bounded by the rivers and the Washington City Canal. It was coterminous with the boundaries of the city’s Seventh Ward and took in all of its southwest quadrant,⁴⁷ including part of what is now the Mall, plus a portion of the southeast quadrant to 2nd Street.

Kalorama Hospital – Opened August 23, 1861, the Kalorama Eruptive Fever General Hospital was located on the old Joel Barlow estate, “Kalorama,” north of Florida Avenue, around the present intersection of 23rd and S Streets, NW. It consisted of perhaps ten racially segregated wards—for soldiers, civilians, and Quartermaster Department employees suffering from smallpox, measles and other highly communicable “eruptive” diseases—in the Barlow house and adjoining outbuildings and barracks. It closed July 1867. It was the successor to an eruptive fever hospital at 1st Street, NE between B and C Streets.

Kendall Green Barracks/Kendall Green Park – This was a 42-room series of barracks, probably at the former Camp Sprague/Finley Hospital barracks off 4th Street, on Bladensburg Road near the Kendall Green estate, now Gallaudet University. Rented to freedpeople from 1866, much of the barracks burned in January 1868.

Lincoln Depot – This major Quartermaster Department materiel depot was located around B Street, NE between 14th and 18th Streets.

Lincoln Hospital – The largest of the District of Columbia’s Civil War hospitals, Lincoln General Hospital opened in December 1862 at the south side of East Capitol Street between 12th and 15th Streets. The property already included freedmen’s quarters late in the war. Following the conflict, it was used by the Freedmen’s Bureau to treat sick and injured African Americans, as well as containing barracks rented to freed families and the post hospital for the 29th U.S. Infantry.

Murder Bay – A mostly African-American neighborhood of modest dwellings and shanties located between Ohio Drive, NW, the Washington City Canal, and 13th and 15th Streets, it adjoined the southeast corner of the “President’s Park” and the northeast corner of the Washington Monument grounds.

Orphan Asylum – The Washington City Orphan Asylum stood at the southeast corner of 14th and S Streets, NW.

Quartermaster Hospital – The original “Quartermaster’s Hospital” was located on the east side of 17th Street, NW between L and M Streets, but it was relocated in October 1863 to the Saint Aloysius Hospital on the west half of the square bounded by North Capitol, K, L and 1st Streets, NW. Until that time, the year-old Saint Aloysius Hospital had been a general hospital branch for soldiers. The “Smallpox Branch” of the Quartermaster Hospital (discontinued August 4, 1865) refers to a Quartermaster branch or ward of the Kalorama Eruptive Fever Hospital (see Kalorama Hospital, above).

Twenty-Building Hill – Located on South Capitol Street around N Street, this was one of Washington’s earliest neighborhoods, developed at the beginning of the nineteenth century by Morris, Nicholson and Greenleaf on land belonging to Daniel Carroll of Duddington.

Wisewell Barracks – Located on the square bounded by 6th, 7th, O and P Streets, NW, these former troop and hospital barracks were rented to freedpeople from 1866 to 1868 and also housed an industrial school.

Notes

This column of the table is usually blank but may include information such as place of birth or former residence, duration of residence in Washington, occupation, marital status, family relationships, date admitted to a hospital, duration of illness prior to death, death date, smallpox vaccination status (recorded for many who died of the disease), and other data. One common piece of information is a length or height measurement intended as instruction to the coffin makers. It is unlikely that coffins were made precisely to measure, as opposed to being produced in sizes varying by foot or half-foot increments. Therefore, “coffin” measurements that are expressed in other than such round numbers can probably be interpreted as actual heights of the deceased, intended as a minimum length for the box. This column also sometimes contains partial transcriptions of the gravestone inscription, when it is at variance with the known identity of the deceased.

Sources

The following are the sources of the data below and codes to indicate each source. Most are federal records, as municipal records of deaths and burials were not kept in the District of Columbia for most of the war era. Newspapers are used to a limited degree to corroborate or flesh out the official records, but only the Daily National Republican has been researched in a thorough fashion. Many individuals appear in several sources, permitting some cross-checking of information. After the individual records were compiled and the gravestone inscriptions checked, the two extant burial registers—one circa 1867 held by the cemetery today, and one from about a decade later and located at the National Archives—were consulted for all the civilian burials. They are cited below (as ANCBR1 and RG92E627) following those entries for which they provide information additional to or at variance with that on the gravestone or as furnished by the other records. The earlier book, however, is often the only source for a death or burial date. Historic maps, city directories and other primary and secondary sources were also consulted to pinpoint addresses.

⁴⁸ Like the other sources, the hospital and burial records for the Quartermaster employees contain numerous apparent errors, and the errors add up as the information is transferred. The hospital records contained in this entry are presumably the most accurate as to the ages and origins of the employees. Quotation marks used to indicate "ditto" seem to be used indiscriminately in the death/burial records for Giesboro, and these entries were passed on uncritically, causing some confusion of ages, birthplaces and causes of death. The number of cases of typhus fever, for instance, is surely over-reported. The dead from Giesboro apparently all came from Hospital Dupuy at the Giesboro cavalry depot, and probably all either worked at, or in the case of the teamsters, were based at, Giesboro. The Giesboro cemetery may be Washington's only Civil War burying ground that was truly desegregated; it appears that each deceased individual, regardless of race, occupied the next available grave. There seems to have been little concern initially with even recording race. As a consequence, it is possible that a few African-American employees were reinterred among white ones in another section of Arlington, possibly including Benjamin White, William Fletcher, M.H. Taylor and John Simson (at Graves 10037, 10040, 10409 and 10778, respectively).
