EXPLANATORY NOTE

The National Insurance Act, 1959, provides that where, at the end of a person's service in a non-participating employment, he is not assured of equivalent pension benefits in respect of the period of his service, his employer must make a payment in lieu of contributions to the National Insurance Fund.

These Regulations contain provisions for determining when a person's period of service ends and for giving notice of that fact. They provide for the disregard of temporary interruptions, and for the time for making a payment in lieu of contributions. They lay down conditions on which a person is treated as assured of equivalent pension benefits, and contain special provisions for concurrent employments and for treating consecutive employments as a single continuous employment. They also make provision for delaying refunds of contributions from occupational superannuation funds in cases where the employer has a right to recover part of his payment from the amount to be refunded. The remaining provisions are of a minor or consequential nature.
